Communication technology has invaded our life. Psychologists are worried that youngsters do not want to spend time with anything else but social media sites and live their relationships in a virtual world. The term “Facebook addiction” describes a psychological issue which is very frequent nowadays. People often choose to talk to each other via mobile phone, Skype, Facebook or Twitter, scientists believe, because they may be afraid of getting to know each other face to face. However, by doing this, they don’t get to see their partners’ facial expression or gestures, and human emotions are reduced to “likes”/ ”dislikes” and smiley faces.

It appears that people don’t even argue about things in the usual way and carry out great conflicts in the open, on these networking sites. Then other people make public comments about their conflicts. This is how problems that should be solved privately and shared only with friends are eventually shared with numerous online users. Twitter allows users to send and receive short messages, called “tweets”, which are up to 140 characters long and can be sent from people’s computers or mobile phones. However, photo uploads are not allowed. Twitter users follow what other people post, sometimes users promote events or products, but sometimes they simply inform other people on their daily activities, such as “I’m off to school”.

Facebook, the world’s biggest social media network, has announced that it now has over one billion active users, which is one seventh of the planet’s population. Since its launch in 2004, there have been over one trillion “likes” and over 17 billion uploaded photos. Over 600 million Facebook users connect through mobile phones. In some African countries there is a simplified version of Facebook, which can be accessed on mobile phones with no Internet connection, to make sure that even people in rural areas have a Facebook account.
